Colonial Williamsburg

By Marcia Shafer

In this article I am going to discuss Colonial Williamsburg in Williamsburg, Virginia. It is a wonderful living museum to visit. If you are a history buff of the time period of the 18th century, this is the place to visit, participate, and learn more of what life in the United States was like in the 1700s. This will give you a knowledge of the efforts of many people to bring the New England Colonies forward as independent and form the United States of America.

You will step back in time to learn how they farmed, some of the animals they raised that were rare breeds from other countries, the tools they used, and how they used or reused/recycled parts of equipment and from the animals they used various parts for food or comfort. (Fowl for their feather beds, pillows, and pens to write with, sheep for their wool to make clothing and blankets, cows to have milk and make cheese). You will see farm buildings as they existed in the 1700s usually connected to the house with a different room or building separating the house and barn.

You will see original buildings with original architecture, hardware, wide board floors and walls that are built true to the year and time period. You will see buildings that are reconstructed based on descriptions or details that are documented by the stone foundation uncovered during archeological digs, or based on the items found during the dig that represent tools and items used for the trade or service they would have been used in. They have located items long buried that can tell stories of the past which will help them research and restore a building from the past; business, home, church, storage building, trades business and then attempt to recreate and build that structure using period appropriate tools to reconstruct it. They will sift through layers of soil to locate any items that may help identify what was located there in the past.

You will step back in time and see and meet many actors who portray a specific person and they will dress and probably speak as they did in the 18th century. Men, women, children, and the enslaved people who lived and worked towards forming a new nation tell their stories of their lives and how they lived in that time, what their character did for a living, what kind of clothes they wore, what their tools were for their trades, how they kept house and farm, how they got the supplies they needed for food and for making a living. You can go to the Governor's Palace, take tours of homes, eat at taverns, go to meeting houses, take horse drawn carriage of various styles for rich and poor, ox and wagon rides, and purchase items in the shops and stores. You may also be lucky enough to meet a politician there standing on a doorstep discussing with the crowds of people what is going on in the fight for freedom or what kind of plans are being made to halt the British. You may go to a court proceeding and be a witness or a jury member for the trial of a person.

There are many activities of interest to both children and adults. You can simply walk around and look for and see the sights of a teeming town, businesses, personal homes and town's people living their lives as they work, go to market, attend church, or go to a skilled trades person for an item they need to purchase or repair. You can go to see evening programs such as the Ghost Walk and listen to stories from actual people who have experienced ghostly inhabitants and know which properties are haunted.

There are evening programs of colonial dancing with the colony portrayers in period costumes and visitors are invited to learn how to dance from that 18th century and the instruments they used to play the music. You will see gentry and the common person mixing together in their appropriate clothing including wigs, shoes, and hats. You will hear and see traditional music, dancing, theatrics, and games.

You will see fields of crops, how they were planted with the tools used at that time and gardens full of beautiful flowers that bloom for spring, summer, and fall, and see vegetable gardens and orchards. You can eat at several different taverns, or at other eateries on the grounds.

You can see how bricks were made, sheep were sheared, cows were milked, see the different types of horses that were used for carriages, farm work, and riding. You can take fencing lessons, enlist in the Continental Army, be trained to use your gun, and shoot a musket. You will learn of the life of a soldier and how many did not survive the battles.

Colonial Williamsburg has a fife and drum corp to perform for various events as well as Reveille, Retreat, and Tattoo. A military Tattoo was originally a signal for soldiers to return to their barracks before curfew. The regimental musicians have a Grand March and Review and compete against other fife and drum corps. Ages of most of the corps range from 10 to 18 and are in the corps until they graduate from high school. They must learn up to 300 songs from memory to play and become a master fife and drummer. COLONIAL WILLIAMSBURG

There are many more opportunities of living and learning about the young colony of New England developing into a United States of American with revolutionary political activities as well as common town's people and skilled tradesmen who portray their skills from the 1700's into the early 1800's. Multiple role players will expound on this on the streets, steps of homes, and in the taverns and meeting houses.

A play is presented for the Salem Witches Trial based on actual documentation with audience participation. There are multiple museums to visit with items from the initial colony such as dishes, glass ware, and furniture. You can go to the hospital that remains from the Civil War and see homes where bullets pierced the buildings.

If you plan to go to Colonial Williamsburg check the internet site for descriptions of presentations that will be offered while you are there or plan to go when they have a program of something that interests you and your family. Some programs will state they are not for children. You can go for a one day visit or you can get a 3 day pass to be sure to see everything. There are trolleys that will take you from the Introduction building to the actual colony or you can walk over following sidewalks and trails. Enjoy a wonderful way to learn about America in the late 1700's and early 1800's.

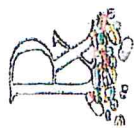

In the next quarterly newsletter I will finish with Jamestown and Yorktown which are near Colonial Williamsburg.
